Afterwards, in a journey through Holland, he also made enquiries into the conduct of the crops, and the method of manufacturing it; having obtained admission into their stoves, where he found a management more expensive, but no ways preferable to what is practised by many in England; this he did that he might enter upon the culture himself, with that knowledge of the business which was requisite for avoiding great errors. Ill success in such pursuits, is more often owing to hafly, premature attempts, than to really natural obstructions--It is oftener the moral, than the physical capability that is wanting. During his stay in Holland, he examined their madder grounds with the minutest attention; made every requisite enquiry for gaining as complete a knowledge of the culture as possible--and from thence was convinced of the propriety of attempting it at home. He took the opportunity of being in that country, to make himself further acquainted with husbandry in general. He travelled through all the provinces, and likewise wise that region of good husbandry, FlanDers, and being perfectly acquainted with the Dutch and French languages, he was able to gain whatever information he wanted; accordingly he has introduced several practices on his own farm, the hint of which he caught in Flanders. Experiments No. 7. He began his undertaking with trying one acre in the year. 1765. The soil a deep black loam. It was dug 18 inches deep in March,...
